You are welcome! were all from the community, and this is where the barrier began. Newcomers to Montréal from Eastern Canada are often greeted with little more than a smile and a nod, and that is what we need to change. In order to understand the North American psyche, it is also necessary to realize the historic role of First Nations, particularly Inuit, in the sub-arctic climate. We need to create a new norm of inclusiveness and service in Montréal. Spencer says: "We need to establish a new norm of service, an inclusiveness." This new norm of service should include taking care of the city's infrastructure. As we have seen in other cities, Montréal's most poorly maintained streets are on the Caribbean-bound side. The same goes for our huge forests, since they only benefit the developer's bottom line. One of the most touching moments of the film was when Spencer met the two young teenaged Inuit from Northern Quebec who had become so close to him during the shoot. It was their first time in a city like Montréal, and they were amazed by the size of the city. They did not know that the city was also home to people from other ethnic groups, and it was nice to see their surprise. The opportunity to work on this project came about through an incredible fortune that Spencer credits to his friend (and lead producer), Peter Rutherford. During the course of a few short years, he has become one of the
