History AutoCAD was originally developed by Sperry-Unisys and released in December 1982. John E. Hogenbeek and Michael E. Smith were the AutoCAD designers. The name Autodesk, LLC was adopted in March 2003 by the successor company Autodesk. The company is based in San Rafael, California, and was founded in 1979 by John E. Hogenbeek, Michael E. Smith and Karl Karlstrom. A screen capture of the first AutoCAD drawing in December 1982. AutoCAD is based on the language of the post-1980s industry standard Unified Modeling Language (UML). Although UML was introduced in the mid-1980s, its adoption in industry was slow. Microsoft acquired Autodesk in 1998, with the promise of introducing UML into other Microsoft applications, such as Microsoft Visio. AutoCAD history The original 1982-released AutoCAD software was shipped with a single function, and was also available as a license for the use of multiple users. That AutoCAD's first release was a single function is seen as a major disadvantage by some critics. "However, the first release is a substantial improvement over the original Apple Computer version that was publicly released that same year. The Apple Macintosh and the BASIC operating system were all important components to the original AutoCAD release. AutoCAD itself wasn't a true major milestone in the computer design industry for two reasons: the original release was a single function tool (albeit a very significant one), and UML wasn't available when the first AutoCAD release was available. The first version of AutoCAD has several unique features, such as a GDS (Graphic Data System) layer and an object-based conceptual layer, allowing the user to develop his/her model entirely in one of these two layers. The first version of AutoCAD was shipped with a single function, and used a heavily BASIC-influenced scripting language. However, in the early 1990s, the structure develop a simple, rapid, sensitive, and specific urine test for goitre (thyroid enlargement) in infants and children. A new, colorimetric assay (iodine trap assay) is being developed based on reaction of iodine with tetrathionate anions in an organic solvent. The test can be performed in any clinical chemistry laboratory. Preliminary data indicates the sensitivity of the test for goitre is within a range that may be important clinically. A pilot study using the iodine trap assay was performed in a local clinical laboratory with a mean time of 6 hours (range 3 to 8 hours). The test was positive in 87% of 110 cases of goitre and negative in 71% of 41 control cases. The level of sensitivity of the test indicates that it may be useful as a screening test for goitre in infants and children. However, further studies are needed to determine the level of sensitivity of the test and its usefulness for detecting the degree of goitre. A larger study is being planned. The testing will be performed in the laboratory of a local non-governmental organization (NGO) with the help of the Public Health Division of the Ministry of Health in the Republic of the Marshall Islands. Before the test can be used clinically in the Republic of the Marshall Islands, it must be evaluated further in a number of locations in the region.
